When Tim saw her, sweeping gracefully through the offices, her golden hair falling lightly over her sturdy young shoulders, he forgot all about the little stenographer. The girl was Madge Jenkins, daugater of Mr. Dudley Jenkins, senior partner of Jenkins & Barr.

The girl had gone straight to her father's onles and a few minutes later was seen going out again at her father's side apparently to have lunch with him at his downtown club.

Somehow the air was fresher and the day was brighter to Tim Austin because of that visit of Madge Jenkins. She was just in her teens at the time and Tim, at sixteen, was beginning his career.

Once-it was two years later and by this time Tim had come to regard the girl as his presiding divinity-Madge had brought bor dog to the office with her.

"Would you be so good-could you just hold him in leash till I come out?" Then, ofter he had *sturned the dog

Poor Showing Made By Chaves Teachers

The recent hot weather down in Chaves county may be responsible for the rather poor showing made by the teachers at the examinations taken following the institute. It is now estimated not more than 60 per cant of the Chaves teachers passed the examinations. The papers of Chaves county have been graded and this estimate of 60 per cent was made today. It means that four out of ten teachers will have to go to institute again and try to pass a better exam.

Chaves county is the first of the 26 counties in the state to be completed. The reading board is at work on the papers of the other counties, and it will require several weeks to read them. - Santa Fe New Mexican

Very dry farming seems to be the order of the day.

Another shower fell on the Kenna community Tuesday eve and again Wednesday noon.

to its pretty owner, after he had been introduced to her by Mr. Jenkins himself, he realized for the first time the breach that lay between them. What must be her contempt for him? The fact that he was no longer office boy, that he had obtained rapid promotion and had even been taken out to lunch at the club by the "boss" seemed to make ne difference. Then came the day when Mr. Jenkins asked him to have dinner with him at his home.

As they were taking the elevator it was akin to a blow to have Mr. Jenkins say: "My daughter will be disappointed not to be at home. But it is the night of some sort of schoolfestivity.

Then came a time when Jenkins and Barl parted conspany, and for business reasons Tim was retained by Barr instead of Jenkins. All that happened before Tim was two and twenty.

Now, with anyone but Tim it might have been simply a passing memorythat little experience with the golden-haired Madge. But to Tim it was much more than that. It was even enough to account for the fact that he hever took more than a very passing interest in the girls he met. At twenty-six or seven, when the sign over his office door read "Barr & Austin," he had sarned for himself the reputation of being insmune so far as pretty girls were concerned.

"Is this Mr. Barr?" She, the one who asked this question, was a quietly dressed little person who had been ushered into Tim Austin's presence by his office boy as a "young lady looking for a job." Austin was somewhat annoyed by the intrusion, but as a matter of fact, he needed a new typist and made a role always to interview personally those whose names went down on his pay roll. This time, however, Tim scarcely looked up at the young woman. Something in her general appearance and in the tone of her veice reassured him that she would be a satisfactory employee."

For a week or so Tim saw little of the new typist. Once or twice he meard Harr say that she was pretty, but the Mea of prettiness in any employee interested Tim not at all. If any interest did come to him with regard to the new typist it was because she apparently wanted to avoid bim, because she found an excuse always to leave any room he happened to

It was in March when the big snowstorm of the winter occurred that year, and Tim Austin was not especially surprised that out of the four or five members of the entire establishment who ventured out that day and arrived at work on time, the new typist was one. Needless to say, Tim was also on time. His own stenographer had not arrived and it occurred to him that the new typist might be able to take his dictation.

Hurriedly he made his way into the large, light room where she did her work. When he opened the door she gave a little cry of alarm. She was standing before the radiator somewhat the worst for her encounter with the storm. She had spread out her coat to dry and was holding her hands to the heat. But what Tim noticed and what had caused the cry of alarm was that the new typist's hair was hanging, disheveled and moistened by the snow, over her shoulders.

Tim stopped with sudden surprise. For the first time he looked searchingly at the girl. Yes, it really was. It was the same hair, those were the same eyes, and that was the same voice. It was actually Madge Jenkins.

"I have always been faithful to the memory of the only girl that ever charmed me," he said as soon as he could trust himself to speak. "I suppose it is always that way when a man really loves, even if he is only a callow office boy at the time."

"But why did you never let me know?" she asked, with the same voice that had charmed him so many years before.

"So long as you had money and position I never could have told you 1 loved you," Tim said, "but now it isn't so very difficult. It seems strange that I should be glad of your apparent misfortune. Perhaps I can do something for your father if he has falled. It is a long time since I have heard of him.

Madge looked up at him with glowing checks and sparkling eyes. They kisaed.
